NEW YORK CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY, A BODY CORPORATE.

PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE NEW JERSEY COURT OF ERRORS AND APPEALS.

To the Honorable Chief Justice and Associate Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States:

Antoinette Coviello, respectfully presents this petition for a writ of certiorari to review the final judgment of the New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals, the highest Court of the State of New Jersey in which a decision in the above entitled cause could be had, rendered January 9, 1942 (R. 105).

Summary of the Matter Involved.

Antoinette Coviello, as widow and sole dependent of Giuseppe Coviello, filed a petition for compensation in the Workmen's Compensation Bureau of the New Jersey Department of Labor, against the New York Central Railroad Company (R. 6-8). This Bureau dismissed the petition on the ground that Giuseppe Coviello at the time of the accident was engaged in work of interstate transportation and because of the Federal Employers' Liability Act (45 U. S. C. A., Sec. 51, p. 92) the New Jersey Compensation Act (R. S. of N. J., Title 34, Chap. 15-18) could not afford a remedy (R. 79-81). The Hudson County Court of Common Pleas, on appeal, reversed the Bureau, and holding that Giuseppe Coviello was engaged in work of an intrastate character, awarded compensation under the New Jersey Statute (R. 91-94). The New Jersey Supreme Court affirmed the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas (R. 94-96). The New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals reversed the judgment of the Supreme Court by a vote of 7 to 6. A re-argument was allowed by the New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals, but that Court by the same vote of 7 to 6, adhered to its former ruling (R. 104-104A).

The facts are not in dispute and as found by the New Jersey courts are briefly as follows (R. 91-92): Giuseppe Coviello for a number of years prior to his death on November 10, 1936, was employed by the New York Central Railroad Company as a laborer. His duties were to oil and grease the switches, as well as clean and replenish the oil in the switch lamps on the tracks of the railroad in its freight yard located at Weehawken, New Jersey. On certain days his work was the greasing and oiling of the switches, and on certain other days, of which November 10, 1936, was one, his work was the cleaning and replenishing of oil in the switch lamps. The Weehawken Yard of the railroad where Coviello performed the work above described, was used as a classification yard almost entirely, if not exclusively, for the movement and classification of freight cars, loaded and empty, moving in transportation between the several states of the United States. Some time between 3 and 4:30 on the afternoon of November 10, 1936, Coviello suspended his work of filling and cleaning the switch lamps to go to a toilet located on a float bridge adjacent to the yard. He slipped and fell into the water and was drowned.

Jurisdiction.

The basis upon which it is contended that this Court has jurisdiction to review the judgment of the New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals in this cause is Section 237-(b) of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C. A., Title 28, Section 344-(b)).

The New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals erroneously granted an immunity claimed by the New York Central Railroad Company under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (U. S. C. A., Title 45, Section 51), when it held that Giuseppe Coviello was engaged in interstate transportation and because of that Federal Statute the New Jersey courts were deprived of jurisdiction to award compensation otherwise payable by State law.

Questions Presented.

1. Whether under the undisputed facts, Giuseppe Coviello at the time he met his death was or was not engaged in interstate transportation within the meaning of the Federal Employers' Liability Act.

Reasons Relied On for the Allowance of the Writ.

The decision of the New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals that Giuseppe Coviello was engaged in interstate transportation at the time of his death is a Federal question of substance, decided in a way probably not in accord with the applicable decisions of this Court (Rule 38-5-a).

WHEREFORE your petitioner respectfully prays that a writ of certiorari issue to the New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals and submits hereto annexed brief in support of this petition.

Respectfully submitted,

EDWARD A. MARKLEY,
Attorney for Petitioner.

ANTOINETTE COVIELLO,

Petitioner,

NEW YORK CENTRAL RAILROAD COMPANY,

A BODY CORPORATE.

BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF PETITION.

I.

Giuseppe Coviello was not engaged in interstate transportation.

The New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals in holding that Giuseppe Coviello was engaged in interstate transportation at the time of his death decided that question contrary to the following decisions of this Court.

Chicago & Northwestern R. R. Co. v. Bolle, 284 U. S. 74;

Chicago & Eastern Illinois R. R. Co. v. Industrial Commission, 284 U. S. 296;

N. Y., N. H. & H. R. Co. v. Bezue, 284 U. S. 415.

In Chicago & Northwestern R. R. Co. v. Bolle, cited supra, the plaintiff was employed by the railroad to fire a stationary engine. This engine was utilized to generate steam for the purpose of heating the passenger depot, baggage room, and other structures and rooms used for general railroad purposes. The steam was also used to heat suburban passenger coaches while standing in the yard. Some of these coaches taken off of interstate trains were heated when necessary, before being taken up by other interstate trains. A way-car and bunk cars converted into stationary structures and occupied by some of the employees engaged in the track maintenance and bridge building departments, were likewise heated. Some of the steam was used to prevent freezing of a turntable that turned engines employed both in interstate and intrastate traffic. In the trial court the plaintiff recovered a judgment under the Federal statute. This judgment was reversed by this Court on the sole ground that the plaintiff's employment was not that of interstate transportation or work so closely related thereto as to be a part thereof. In the course of the opinion Mr. Justice Sutherland said (p. 78):

> "It will be observed that the word used in defining the test is 'transportation,' not the word 'commerce.' The two words were not regarded as interchangeable, but as conveying different meanings. Commerce covers the whole field of which transportation is only a part; and the word of narrower signification was chosen understandingly and deliberately as the appropriate term. The business of a railroad is not to carry on commerce generally. It is engaged in the transportation of persons and things in commerce; and hence the test of whether an employee at the time of his injury was engaged in interstate commerce, within the meaning of the act, naturally must be whether he was engaged in interstate transportation or in work so closely related to such transportation as to be practically a part of it."

> "Plainly, the respondent in the present case does not bring himself within the rule. At the time of receiving his injury he was engaged in work not incidental to transportation in interstate commerce, but purely incidental to the furnishing of means for heating the station and other structures of the company. His duty ended when he had produced a supply of steam for that purpose. He had nothing to do with its distribution or specific use. Indeed, what he produced was not used or intended to be used, directly or indirectly, in the transportation of anything. It is plain that his work was not in interstate transportation and was not so closely related to such transportation as to cause it to be practically a part of it. Certainly that work was no more closely related to transportation than was that of the employee in the Harrington case, who placed coal in the chutes for the use of locomotives engaged in interstate transportation; or that of the employee in the Cousins case, who supplied coal for heating the shop in which cars used in interstate traffic were repaired. The work of the employees in those cases and that of the respondent here are, in fact, so nearly alike in their lack of necessary relationship to interstate transportation, as to be in principle the same."

In Chicago & Eastern Illinois R. R. Co. v. Industrial Commission, cited supra, an employee of the railroad company in attempting to oil an electric motor while it was running, was injured. The railroad was engaged in both interstate and intrastate commerce. The motor furnished power for hoisting coal into a chute to be taken therefrom by and for the use of locomotive engines principally employed in interstate work. Proceedings were brought under the State law for compensation. The railroad contended the employee was engaged in interstate commerce and that the compensation commission was without jurisdiction. The commission awarded compensation and on review this Court affirmed the judgment, reversing two of its own previous decisions at the same time. It is interesting to note what this Court had to say as to its own cases, which it definitely overruled:

> "The contention that Thomas was employed in interstate commerce at the time of the injury, rests upon the decision of this Court in Erie R. Co. v. Collins, 253 U. S. 77, and Erie R. Co. v. Szary, 253 U. S. 86. In the Collins case the employee, at the time of his injury, was operating a gasoline engine to pump water into a tank for the use of locomotives engaged in both interstate and intrastate commerce. In the Szary case the duty of the employee was to dry sand by the application of heat for the use of locomotives operating in both kinds of commerce; and he was so employed when injured. In each case this Court held that the employee was engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the injury, within the terms of the Federal Employers' Liability Act.
> "The only difference between those cases and this one is that here the work of the employee related to coal, while in the Collins case it related to water, and in the Szary case, to sand. Obviously, the difference is not one of substance and if the Collins and Szary cases are followed a reversal of the judgment below would result."

At page 299:

> "We are unable to reconcile this decision with the rule deducible from the Collins and Szary cases, and it becomes our duty to determine which is authoritative. From a reading of the opinion in the Collins case, it is apparent that the test of the Shanks case was not followed (see p. 85), the words 'interstate commerce' being inadvertently substituted for the words 'interstate transportation.' The Szary case is subject to the same criticism, since it simply followed the Collins case. Both cases are out of harmony with the general current of the decisions of this Court since the Shanks case, Chicago & North Western Ry. Co. v. Bolle, ante,

p. 74, and they are now definitely overruled. The Harrington case furnishes the correct rule, and, applying it, the judgment below must be affirmed.''

A consideration of the facts in the Collins and Szary cases overruled by this Court in the case of Chicago & Eastern Illinois R. R. Co. v. Industrial Commission, 284 U. S. 296, quoted from above, will show how parallel the facts are with the case at bar.

In Erie R. R. Co. v. Collins, 253 U. S. 77, the plaintiff operated a signal tower and water tank, the tower being used for the operation of trains in interstate and intrastate commerce. The tank was used for supplying the locomotives of the trains with water, which was pumped from a closeby well into the tank by a gasoline engine which the plaintiff operated. While engaged in starting this gasoline engine he was injured. It appeared that trains carrying interstate commerce ran daily and their engines were supplied with water daily at this station. This Court originally held that this was interstate transportation but overruled that decision and held it was intrastate transportation. If this employee attending to a gasoline engine which pumped water for use in interstate locomotives was not engaged in interstate transportation, then certainly the decedent in the case at bar, who furnished oil to the switch lamps and cleaned the lamps, was not engaged in interstate transportation.

In Erie R. R. Co. v. Szary, 253 U. S. 86, the facts showed that it was necessary to provide dry sand to locomotive engines of the defendant. The plaintiff was employed in its preparation, which was done in a small structure standing in the yards alongside of the track, called the 'sand house.' The drying of the sand was done in four large stoves which it was the duty of the plaintiff to attend. The ashes from these stoves had to be dumped at intervals in an ash pit nearby. After supplying sand to about seven locomotives whose destinations were other states, Szary was carrying ashes from the stoves to the ash pit when he was injured. This Court originally held that this work was interstate transportation, but overruled that decision and held that it was intrastate transportation. If the removal of the ashes from these stoves which dried sand for interstate engines was too remote to be considered interstate transportation, then the decedent in the case at bar in supplying oil to the switch lamps and cleaning those lamps was too far removed from interstate transportation to be a part thereof and come under the Federal Act.

In New York, New Haven & Hartford R. R. Co v. Bezue, cited supra, the railroad maintained at one of its termini, a roundhouse, a machine shop, a carpenter shop and a so-called hoist building. These facilities were used largely for servicing and repairing locomotives used in interstate transportation. The employee worked as a member of a general unskilled labor gang at this terminal. His principal work was the operation of an electric truck with which he transported materials from one portion of the plant to another. He also assisted in various minor repairs to engines brought into the terminal. On the day of the accident he was helping to remove a pair of main driving wheels from the lathe in the hoist building and rolling them to the engine pit in the yard. These wheels were to be installed on a locomotive. In holding that the employee was not engaged in interstate transportation and therefore did not come under the Federal statute, Justice Roberts said p. 419):

> "The state Court held that the terminal facilities in which respondent worked constitute a part of the railroad's system necessary to the operation of the road and to the conduct of interstate commerce; that the fact that some work is there done on locomotives engaged in intrastate commerce does not deprive the establishment of its character as an essential instrumentality of interstate commerce; that the respondent was engaged in a 'plant service' and worked indiscriminately upon engines engaged in interstate and intrastate commerce. The conclusion was that the nature and purpose of the plant warranted characterization of all respondent's work, of whatever nature, as in interstate commerce.

"The test thus applied is broader than our decisions justify. All work performed in railroad employment may, in a sense, be said to be necessary to the operation of the road. The business could not be conducted without repair shop employees, clerks, janitors, mechanics, and those who operate all manner of appliances not directly or intimately concerned with interstate transportation as such, or with facilities actually used therein. But we have held that the mere fact of employment does not bring such employees within the act."

The decision of the New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals in the case at bar is contrary to prior decisions of that court and of several United States Circuit Courts.

In Martin v. Central R. R. Co. of N. J., 116 N. J. L. 162 (reversing 115 N. J. L. p. 11), the New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals following Chicago & Northwestern R. R. Co. v. Bolle, 284 U. S. 74, held that an employee was not engaged in interstate transportation under the following facts. The employee was a painter working for the railroad. While repairing the skylight on the roof of the terminal train shed of the railroad, he sustained a fall through the skylight, which caused his death. The train shed was used by both interstate and intrastate trains.

In Fury v. New York and Long Branch R. R. Co., 126 N. J. L. 25, 16 Atl. (2d) 544, the New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals held that an employee was not engaged in interstate commerce under the following facts: The employee was a signal maintainer employed by the railroad, with working hours from 8 A. M. to 5 P. M. He was under constant duty to inspect and repair signal equipment at a tower and substation. After 5 P. M. on the day of the accident he went to the substation and made repairs which took about one hour. He was on his way home, walking along the company's tracks, when injured.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Brittain, 93 Fed. (2d) 159 (5th C. C. A.), the question decided was stated by the court in its opinion as follows (p. 160):

> "The sole point urged is that, as matter of law, what plaintiff was admittedly engaged in doing, to wit, hauling timbers to replace unsound sills, and to close in the space under the platform of the non-agency station at Blount Springs, was not transportation, nor was it work so close to it as to be practically a part of it."

In concluding that the employee was not engaged in interstate transportation the court said (p. 162):

> "* * * As we read and understand the Supreme Court decisions, written since the Pedersen case, and especially those most recently written, they hold that while a repairman, injured while engaged in making repairs upon instrumentalities used in interstate commerce, may conceivably be under the act, he will be held to be so only when those repairs are not remotely but directly an essential part of transportation as motion or action. When the work is upon an object which, as relates to transportation, is static in its nature, and is particularly static when the work in question is performed upon it, though that object may, before the work was done, have been useful and used in interstate commerce, and is to continue so, indeed, though the work was done upon it to make it so, such repairs are of course not transportation, neither are they so close to it as to be a part of it, and the repairman injured while doing them is not within the act."

In Poff v. Washington Terminal Co., 69 Fed. (2d) 572, it was held that an employee removing a cylinder head of an ammonia pump in the terminal company's plant for supplying ice used in its passenger station, refrigerator cars, and refrigeration uses generally was not engaged in interstate commerce.

In Pennsylvania R. R. Co. v. Manning, 62 Fed. (2d) 293 (3d C. C. A.), a railroad employee, who, at the time of injury, was fixing an electrical motor which furnished power to a crane used in loading and unloading cars containing both interstate and intrastate freight, was not engaged in interstate commerce. The Court pointed out that his work was merely incidental to the work which the crane did and was not work in interstate transportation so as to come under the Federal Act.

The New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals consists of sixteen members. They are the Chancellor, Chief Justice of the New Jersey Supreme Court, nine associate Justices of the Supreme Court, and seven judges, specially appointed. Three Justices of the New Jersey Supreme Court held that Coviello was not engaged in interstate transportation when this case was before that Court. These Justices were then disqualified from passing on the question when this cause was before the Court of Errors and Appeals. The Court of Errors and Appeals decided that Coviello was engaged in interstate transportation by a vote of seven to six. Therefore, petitioner had a majority of the entire court (nine to seven) decide the question in her favor, but nevertheless, lost the case.

Conclusion.

For the foregoing reasons we respectfully submit that this Court should grant a writ of certiorari to review the final judgment of the New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals.

Respectfully submitted,

BRIEF IN OPPOSITION TO PETITION.

Statement.

On November 10, 1936, the date of the alleged accident, Guiseppe Coviello was in the employ of New York Central Railroad Company in the capacity of "lampman".

The employee's duties consisted in cleaning wicks and glass in switch lamps, oiling and greasing the Company's switches and replenishing the supply of oil in the switch lamps, in the freight yards at Weehawken, New Jersey, used as a classification yard almost entirely, if not exclusively, for the movement and classification of freight cars moving in transportation between several States. This was requisite for both facility and safety in the operation of the interstate transportation.

The said Guiseppe Coviello was last seen filling the lamps about three o'clock in the afternoon of November 10, 1936.

On November 11, 1936, the employee's body was recovered from the Hudson River.

On October 27, 1938, Antoinette Coviello, the widow, filed a petition in the New Jersey Department of Labor, Workmen's Compensation Bureau, seeking compensation due to her as the sole surviving dependent.

The cause was heard by the Honorable Charles E. Corbin, Deputy Commissioner of Labor, in the Compensation Bureau in Jersey City, New Jersey, on July 7 and July 14, 1939.

At the conclusion of the trial in the Compensation Bureau, the said Deputy Commissioner held that:

> "* * * the petitioner has made a prima facie case that the death of Guiseppe Coviello was due to an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, but I find and determine that this Bureau is without jurisdiction to award compensation because the employment of the said Guiseppe Coviello and of the respondent at the time of the accident was work of interstate transportation, or so closely related to it as to be a part thereof."

On January 18, 1940, the Honorable THOMAS H. BROWN, Judge of the Hudson County Court of Common Pleas, reversed the judgment of the "Bureau" and, in part, held the work of the deceased consisted mainly in providing oil for the switch lamps and cleaning them; that he had no direct connection with interstate transportation; and therefore concluded that the decision of the referee below must be reversed and an award made in favor of the then petitioner and as against the then respondent.

On March 16, 1940, on application of New York Central Railroad Company, Chief Justice THOMAS J. BROGAN allowed a writ of certiorari to remove the cause to the New Jersey Supreme Court.

On September 25, 1940, the New Jersey Supreme Court, opinion by Chief Justice THOMAS J. BROGAN, in part, said it did not think that the duties performed by the decedent, i. e., cleaning lamps and greasing switches, even though the instrumentalities were used for transportation and commerce that was interstate in character, can be said to be an engagement in interstate transportation or work so closely related to it as to be part of it. He had nothing whatever to do with interstate transportation.

The said Supreme Court further held that the Compensation Bureau had jurisdiction and should have entertained the petition.

The judgment of the Hudson County Court of Common Pleas was affirmed and the writ of certiorari was dismissed.

The New York Central Railroad Company appealed to the New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals from the decision of the New Jersey Supreme Court and, on April 25, 1941, the said Court of Errors and Appeals reversed the judgment of the New Jersey Supreme Court; thus, in effect, affirming the judgment of the Trial Court, the New Jersey Workmen's Compensation Bureau, ruling that the said Bureau was without jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim.

On Application of the original petitioner, Antoinette Coviello, the New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals granted leave to reargue the appeal.

By an opinion filed on January 9, 1942, the New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals held that:

> "• • • the judgment should be reversed for the reasons set down in the opinion heretofore filed herein and reported in 126 N. J. L. 536."

POINT I.

Guiseppe Coviello was engaged in interstate transportation.

It is obvious that the purposes of greasing the switches and the cleaning the lamps and replenishing the supply of oil in the lamps, on the tracks or switches of the railroad company's classification yards, is to facilitate the operation and progress of cars and trains moving on the tracks, and further the safety of persons and property.

In Pedersen v. Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railroad Co., 229 U. S. 146, it was held that one engaged in the work of maintaining tracks and bridges in proper condition after they have become, and during, their use as instrumentalities of interstate commerce is engaged in interstate commerce, and this, even if those instrumentalities are used both in interstate and intrastate commerce. This case has never been departed from.

In Shanks v. Delaware, Lackawanna & Western R. R. Co., 239 U. S. 556, 36 S. Ct. 188, the Court, in part, said:

> "* * * Coming to apply the test to the case in hand it is plain that Shanks was not employed in interstate transportation (569) or in repairing or keeping in usable condition a roadbed, bridge or car, or other instrument then in use in such transportation * * *."

In both cases hereinbefore cited, by inference, an employee engaged in the work of maintaining tracks or keeping a roadbed in usable condition, after they had become and during their use as instrumentalities of interstate commerce or interstate transportation, is engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the federal act.

In Stiedler v. P. R. R. Company, 94 N. J. Law 197; Certiorari denied, 253 U. S. 489, 64 L. Ed. 1027; it was held that an injury sustained while painting a pole supporting electric wires which carried current to the third rail, came within the Federal statute.

The term "transportation" implies the carrying or conveying from one place or station to another.

Such conveying or carrying, by interstate railroad service, is done by means of cars, trains and boats. The cars and trains are propelled along tracks of the roadbed. Therefore, the cars, trains and tracks are primarily essential for such "transporting."

The "switches" form an important and necessary means of continuity of progress of cars and trains on the proper tracks and the keeping of them in a usable condition is attained by greasing them. Such assignment was part of deceased's duties.

The switch lamps are a necessary adjunct to the working of the switches and the scheme of safety and guidance in the operation of the means of transportation. To be effective, the lamps must be provided with means of illumination. Such was the other assignment of duty to deceased.

Thus, the deceased's duties were solely and exclusively in the care and upkeep of part of the actual instrumentalities of "transportation." He was not engaged in some remote activity, such as supplying sand or water to be used, or repairing or erecting parts of buildings incidental to the general operation of the railroad in interstate "commerce."

The case of Chicago Northwestern R. R. Co. v. Bolle, 284 U. S. 74, cited in petitioner's brief on this application, refers to an employee whose duties were to fire a stationary engine to generate steam for heating a passenger depot, baggage room and other structures and rooms used for general railroad purposes. The steam was also used to heat suburban passenger coaches while standing in the yard, some of which were taken off interstate trains and heated when necessary before being taken up by other interstate trains.

This Court, opinion by Justice SUTHERLAND, said:

> "At the time of receiving his injury he was engaged in work not incidental to transportation in interstate commerce, but purely incidental to the furnishing of means for heating the station and other structures of the company. His duty ended when he had produced a supply of steam for the purpose. He had nothing to do with its distribution or specific use. Indeed, what he produced was not used or intended to be used, directly or indirectly, in the transportation of anything."

This decision does not seem to be dispositive of the facts and claim in the Coviello case because Coviello was engaged in work incidental to transportation. His duties were solely confined to the care of the tracks, the instrumentalities of continuity of progress of the freight trains that transported interstate shipments.

In Chicago & Eastern Illinois R. R. Co. v. Industrial Commission, 284 U. S. 296, the employee was injured while attempting to oil an electric motor. The motor furnished power for hoisting coal into a chute to be taken therefrom by and for the use of locomotive engines principally employed in interstate work.

Again these facts are different than those in the Coviello case. The duties were too remote to be considered "interstate", while Coviello's duties were actual participations in the care of the instrumentality of the means of interstate transportation.

In the case of New York, New Haven & Hartford R. R. Co. v. Bezue, 284 U. S. 415, the employee was helping to remove a pair of main driving wheels from a lathe in the hoist building and rolling them to the engine pit in the yard. The wheels were to be installed on a locomotive.

That operation was too remote to be considered in "interstate transportation". The wheels were to be installed but in the Coviello case the tracks had been installed and were in actual use for interstate transportation purposes.

The decision of the New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals in this case is in accord with the applicable decisions of this Court as it is in agreement with the principles set forth in the case of Shanks v. Delaware, Lackawanna & Western R. R. Co., supra, and the many cases that followed. Coviello's work was the making usable of an instrumentality in actual use, and necessary to the operation of interstate transportation and in that respect is distinguishable from the cases cited in petitioner's brief.

POINT II.

There is no real conflict of decisions involved in the various jurisdictions, and the situation stands practically alone, inasmuch as the death of the employee occurred before the present amendment to the Employers Liability Act.

Ermin v. P. R. R. Company, 36 Fed. Supp. 936.

POINT III.

It is respectfully submitted that the writ should be denied.
